HOUSE, FARM AND GARDEN

Agricultural Items.

America produces about one fourth of the wheat grown in the world. Good farming gives to each soil and crop its proper tilth. The stiffest and poorest soils require the greatest amount of tillage, yet even light soils are rarely over-cultivated. Much plowing and pulverizing of a naturally light soil will not make it more loose and open, but have the contrary effect, making its natural porousness less, and its density greater. It is of course, possible to have a soil too loose, since it must have a certain consistency to retain moisture and support plants. By harrowing the light land while it is still damp, and by heavy rolling as it becomes drier, the necessary degree of firmness may always be obtained.

New York State farms have thus far given quite conclusive evidence in favor of the terminal portion of the potato tuber, so far as regards certainty of growth, early sprouting, healthy vegetation and vigor.

A correspondent of the Western Rural recently sent a sample of sugar bought at a country store for good by that paper showed that 50 per cent, of it was grape stgar (made from corn, and worth about 4 cents a pound), and it also contained large quantities of sulphur. The chemist pronounces it a vile compound.

Millet is an excellent fodder plant, of which cows are exceedingly fond. It is a warm weather crop, and needs to be grown on a light, sandy soil. By manuring well it may be made to produce from two to five tons of hay to the acre. A copious flow of milk is produced by cutting the millet, salting slightly, moistening, and sprinkling with a little meal.
